Summary Paragraph

The 1,001-acre Tangier Island Historic District consists of nearly all of Tangier Island which is located at the widest part of the Chesapeake Bay a few miles south of the Virginia-Maryland border and twelve miles east of Reedville, Virginia. Politically a part of Accomack County on Virginia's Eastern Shore, Tangier Island is approximately three miles long and less than one mile wide. The island was used by the prehistoric inhabitants of the Chesapeake Bay area for procurement of marine and wetland resources, and artifacts reflecting this use over several thousand years have been recovered from the island's shorelines. Modern Tangier Island is composed of a northern uninhabited area known as Uppards and a southern inhabited area of similar acreage consisting of three roughly parallel ridges. The narrow ridges, characterized by low-lying, grassy, and sandy soil with few trees, range from east to west: Canton Ridge, Main Ridge, and West Ridge, each extending north-south for less than a mile, separated by creeks and other waterways, and connected to each other by a total of four east-west causeways and bridges. The extensive system of canals that create protected access to the marshes, and in many cases, right up to residential back yards, was created by watermen over many generations. All areas of the island are only a few feet above sea level and have been eroding slowly, and often dramatically, over the centuries since the island was discovered by Europeans in the early seventeenth century. Small fishing communities that once existed on Uppards have been abandoned since the 1930s and much of that part of Tangier has eroded away. The island's main harbor is situated at the northern extent of Main Ridge and features several wharves and piers with attached crab houses or shanties jutting into the harbor. Most of the shanties line the harbor's channels and can only be accessed by boat. These shanties, the earliest of which date to the 1970s when a new channel leading to the harbor was created, are simple frame structures used by watermen to store their daily catch and watch for molting crabs in order to send them to Crisfield, Maryland, and other markets. Main Ridge features marinas and associated buildings, commercial properties catering to watermen, tourists, and residents, the largest concentration of dwellings on the island, a school, two churches, an electric power plant, a public health center, and a post office. Canton and West Ridges are almost exclusively residential. Although European settlement of Tangier began in the late eighteenth century, no known buildings or structures from that era survive, and it is believed the oldest extant buildings are a handful of small one-and-a-half-story frame houses probably dating to the 1890s, many of which were moved from elsewhere on the island. Architectural styles and forms represented among the district's 227 contributing buildings include Folk Victorian, Craftsman, American Foursquare, Colonial Revival, Gothic/Romanesque Revival, and Neoclassical Revival. Several mobile homes have replaced earlier houses. Outbuildings, mostly located at the rear of dwellings, include a number of small frame sheds and shops, many replaced over time and now considered noncontributing, and a few pump stations. Containing a total of 241 contributing resources and 244 noncontributing resources on a landscape significantly shaped by human occupation, the Tangier Island Historic District is a varied collection of buildings, structures, and sites that represent a unique way of life and a distinctive maritime culture in the middle of the Chesapeake Bay. The 11 contributing sites include 9 small cemeteries and 2 archaeological sites (44AC0524 and 44AC0571) that have been identified by professional archaeologists. There are two noncontributing sites, both small cemeteries, which postdate the district's period of significance.

Narrative Description

The Tangier Island Historic District encompasses most of Tangier Island which is situated in the middle of Chesapeake Bay a few miles south of the Virginia-Maryland border, twelve miles east of Reedville, Virginia, which residents call the Western Shore, and a few miles west of the Eastern Shore of Virginia. The island is divided into two land masses by the North Channel which provides boat access from the west to the Main Harbor and Mailboat Harbor. The two land masses are of similar size—a currently uninhabited area to the north known as Uppards and a largely inhabited area at the southern extent of the island consisting of three ridges from east to west: Canton Ridge, Main Ridge, and West Ridge.

Uppards consists of 530 acres of mostly water and marshland with small strips of land that have been steadily eroding away for generations. Once settled by watermen and their families in small settlements, Canaan Ridge, Oyster Creek, Persimmon Ridge and Reubentown, Uppards was abandoned by the 1930s due to isolation, erosion, and loss of a local school. Some residents took their dwellings with them and reassembled them elsewhere on the island. The five dwellings at 4411 and 4413 Chambers Lane, the Annie Parks House at 16084 Main Ridge Road, the Peter Dise House at 16230 Main Ridge Road, and the Henry Parks House at 16338 West Ridge Road were all relocated from Uppards in the 1920s. Tragically, because of rapid erosion especially in recent years, some family cemeteries left behind on Uppards have eroded into the sea. Five late-18th- to early-19th-century burials eroding from one such cemetery were excavated in 2013 by archaeologists from the Virginia Department of Historic Resources, who carefully removed the remains of several graves actively being exposed by sea and wind. The human remains and associated burial artifacts are now undergoing stabilization and conservation at DHR's archaeological lab facilities in Richmond.

South of the North Channel is the cultural and commercial center and historically the most populated part of Tangier Island. Encompassing about 521 acres, the southern part of the island consists of three narrow ridges of low-lying sandy ground, each extending north-south for less than or about one mile with a road along its spine flanked by buildings on either side. The ridges are primarily subdivided into narrow long lots reaching from the road to the water behind each house. Many of the lots have ditches (narrow canals) that once provided water access to residents' small boats. Small shops and sheds remain at the rear of many of the lots. Except for the harbors to the north, the ridges are surrounded by reedy marshes and shallow water.

Easternmost Canton Ridge is about a half a mile long and features at its northern end one of the highest points of land on the island juxtaposed with some of the deepest water surrounding it. It is believed Tangier's first permanent resident, Joseph Crockett, built a house there in the 1770s followed by his sons' houses later in the century. Nothing aboveground remains of these dwellings which likely were simple, one-story, frame and weatherboard, gable-roofed buildings with perhaps brick chimneys. The probable site of the Joseph Crockett House is now occupied by the Haynie House (5053 Canton Rd.), built in 1994 and currently the largest house on the island. Nearby are a cemetery and the possible site of Lee's Bethel, the island's first church erected in 1838. Farther south is a typical late-nineteenth-century island house (5091 Canton Rd.), a two-story frame and vinyl-sided structure with a one-story rear ell and an interior-end chimney with brick corbelling and recessed brick panels. Once known for its farms and fresh produce, Canton Ridge is now mostly lined with residences of recent construction.

Canton Road abruptly turns west at the northern end of Canton Ridge and continues west along a causeway and a small truss bridge which crosses Canton Creek and continues on to Main Ridge where it intersects with Main Ridge Road. Tangier's main thoroughfare, Main Ridge Road is an asphalt-paved narrow road wide enough for two golf carts (the main means of transportation on the island) to pass. Lined with picket and chain link fences defining narrow street-front lots on each side of the road with buildings usually set back a few feet from the road, Main Ridge Road begins at Parks Marina and the County Dock at the northern end of Main Ridge (an area known locally as Meat Soup) and extends about .27 mile to the southern extent of the ridge in an area known as Black Dye. At various locations on the western side of Main Ridge are four narrow paved causeways that cross marshland and Big Gut to connect Main Ridge to West Ridge, the farthest ridge to the west. From north to south, they are Long Bridge Road, School Lane, Wallace Road, and Factory Road. Other small lanes, some only a few feet wider than a typical golf cart, extend off Main Ridge Road and lead to a handful of houses or businesses closer to the water. To name a few, from north to south, they are Parsonage Lane, Chambers Lane, Gabriel Lane, Janders Road, Ponderosa Lane, Hilda Crockett Road, Garman Road, Dise Lane, and Parker Lane.

The first view of the island by watermen and tourists alike is most likely picturesque Main Harbor or Mailboat Harbor near the northern extent of Main Ridge. Naturally surrounded by shallow waters, Tangier Island did not have a deep water harbor until 1917 when a government dredge created a boat basin at the northern end of Main Ridge, and in 1921 a channel was dug from deep water in Tangier Sound east of the island to the new basin, creating the island's first real harbor and center of commerce for the seafood industry. Since the late 1960s the North Channel has served as the main access to the harbor from the west. Lining the northern bank of the channel and the harbor are rows of piers and wharves with attached crab houses or shanties. These simple, rectangular, frame buildings clad in weatherboards, synthetic siding, or board-and-batten siding, are situated on pilings and are used by watermen to store supplies and crab holding tanks used to observe molting crabs for immediate shipping to nearby markets. Because of their vulnerability and loss to tides, floods, and severe weather, none of the crab houses appear to predate the 1970s.

On the harbor side of the channel is Parks Marina where many residents' boats are docked and where maritime-related buildings and crab holding tanks are situated. Nearby County Dock is a wide plank pier jutting into the water where many passenger boats dock. Tour boats from the Eastern Shore or Crisfield, Maryland, usually dock at the Mailboat Harbor further south. Two two-and-a-half-story frame houses located at 16072 and 16078 Parks Marina Lane are typical late-nineteenth-century dwellings that face the marina. Both are clad in weatherboards, have gable roofs with gable returns, brick chimneys, and pointed-arched attic windows. To the south is another two-story frame house at 16084 Main Ridge which dates to 1887 and was originally the Methodist parsonage. Two historic commercial buildings occupy the intersection of Main Ridge Road with Long Bridge Road and Chambers Lane. The Fisherman's Corner Restaurant (16329 Main Ridge Rd.), a large frame and weatherboard building with a shallow gable roof probably dates to the early twentieth century, while Daly's Grocery (16115 Main Ridge Rd.), built in the 1920s, is a one-story frame and weatherboard building with a gable roof and a tall false front. A well preserved early-twentieth-century store located a few blocks to the south at 16131 Main Ridge Road is a one-story, gable-fronted, frame with board-and-batten building on block piers and featuring tall storefront windows sheltered by a porch with turned posts.

Located on Long Bridge Road near its intersection with Main Ridge Road is Old Cemetery, a plot of land that was originally sold to the public for use as a cemetery in 1858 by Jesse Crockett. It contains over a hundred graves with marble headstones dating from the 1860s to more recent years. Due west of the cemetery is another house form typical of those dating from the late nineteenth century on Tangier that may have been moved to this location from Uppards or elsewhere. It is a one-and-a-half-story, frame and asbestos shingle-clad dwelling with a one-story wing to the west. Featuring a gable roof with gable returns and a brick pier foundation, it is currently a secondary dwelling associated with the house at 4378 Parsonage Lane.

Farther south at 4443 Janders Road is the Electric Plant, a large gable-roofed building, the oldest part of which is the front frame section that dates to 1947. Behind the plant is a marine railway where boats are repaired. At the end of Janders Road was a pier where the James Adams Floating Theatre docked in 1914. The theatre was a troupe of actors who performed on a barge that traveled from port to port pulled by the steamboat Elk.

Situated at the intersection of Main Ridge Road and School Lane is Swain Memorial United Methodist Church (16164 Main Ridge Rd.) whose tall pyramidal-roofed corner entrance tower adorned with a bracketed cornice is perhaps the most recognizable landmark from any vantage point along the three ridges of the island and from most approaches to the island by water. Built in 1899 under the leadership of Rev. C. P. Swain, the large, frame and vinyl-sided, Gothic Revival building with some Romanesque Revival details has a steeply pitched cross-gable roof (originally slate) and round-arched stained glass windows. Across School Lane from the church is the Hiram Benson Educational Building, a large rectangular frame building dating to 1963 and standing on the site of the island's third church, Mariner's Bethel of 1870. Long the center of the island's religious life, Swain Memorial was the only church on the island until 1947 when a split in the congregation over a theological issue resulted in the formation of the New Testament congregation whose members first met in houses until they erected in 1957 their own church at 16289 Main Ridge Road. It is a simple, two-story, frame and weatherboard building with a projecting corner vestibule and eight-over-eight-sash, double-hung windows. North of the church is a typical example of a twentieth-century Tangier Island cemetery which is characterized by tight rows of graves marked by a variety of marble and granite tombstones and covered by heavy rectangular concrete slabs to protect them during flooding. Other similar and smaller cemeteries are found throughout the island as are individual graves, many located in the front yards of houses along the ridges, owing most likely to the scarcity of high ground for burials.

Behind Swain Memorial Church on School Lane stands the Tangier Combined School, so named because all of the island's students attend classes there. Dedicated in 1998, it is a large, frame, gable-roofed building standing on a tall wood-pier foundation and fronted by a Neoclassical columned portico. The location of the first school building (1871) is unknown; however, the second school (1905) stood behind the church and old photos of it show a tall, two-story, frame and weatherboard structure capped by a deck-on-hip roof with dormers. A projecting entrance tower was topped by an open belfry. The third school (1932), once located opposite the present school, was a one-story frame building with end pavilions, a small central portico, and tall multipane windows.

One of the island's newest buildings is the David B. Nichols Health Center, located at 16186 Main Ridge Road, which is a two-story, frame and yellow vinyl-sided, side-gable-roofed building on a tall concrete block foundation and fronted by a one-story, nearly full-length porch with Tuscan columns. Dedicated in 2011 and named in honor of the island's devoted doctor who is buried adjacent to the center he helped found, the building was designed by Virginia architect William D. Prillaman to complement the island's architecture.

The section of Main Ridge Road south of the Health Center is often photographed for its quaint and picturesque character. Fronting the road on both sides are several two-story, side-gable-roofed, frame houses dating from the late nineteenth century, some featuring original decorative sawnwork in their gables, along their bargeboards, and festooning their porches. Many have corbelled brick chimneys and central front gables with pointed-arched attic windows, while others have enclosed porches and have been clad in aluminum or vinyl siding. A noted example is the Edward Crockett House at 16199 Main Ridge Road with its central front gable with a round-arched attic window, bracketed cornice with returns, and a porch with an elaborate bracketed and spindle frieze. Once the home of "Sugar Tom" Crockett (1833-1905), the island's first historian and author, it was later a hotel and a physician's office.

A fine row of similar houses on the east side of the road are the dwellings at 16223, 16227, and 16233 Main Ridge Road and another row of three, two-story, frame and sided houses with bracketed eaves and porches with sawnwork at 16249, 16251, and 16255 Main Ridge Road. Two more notable late-nineteenth-century dwellings are the Peter S. Crocket House located at 16246 and the Nathan Rayfield House at 16243 Main Ridge Road. Both houses are now operated as the Chesapeake House, a popular hotel and dining room established by Hilda Crockett in 1944. The former Rayfield House features an especially fine porch with chamfered posts and decorative sawnwork. The best example of a well preserved house of the period is the Captain Patrick Benson House at 16307 Main Ridge Road in the area known as Black Dye. It is a two-and-a-half-story frame and weatherboard dwelling with a wide central front gable featuring a round-arched attic window and an elaborate sawn bargeboard. The full-length front porch has turned posts and fanciful sawnwork.

A more recent landmark is the island's first mobile home which is a somewhat streamlined metal-clad building that was shipped by barge in 1959 to the lot at the corner of Main Ridge and Wallace roads. The area also contains a few additional gable-fronted former stores dating to the early twentieth century, such as Parks Store at 16315 Main Ridge Road established by Capt. Henry Parks (1862-1933) and operated until recently by his descendants. Down Hilda Crockett Road is the site of the Tangier Opera House where the first movie was shown on the island in 1908 and the site of the wireless station which operated from 1909 to 1913.

At the end of Main Ridge Road, Banny's Road leads southward towards the site of Banty's Wharf, once the major landing point for the island and now the site of a few crab houses. It was here that President and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson came ashore on April 1, 1916, disembarking from the presidential yacht Mayflower and proceeding up the main street to the amazement of the Tangierians. Regular steamboat service started in 1884 when steamboats began anchoring in what later was called Steamboat Harbor at the south end of Main Ridge. Typically, local boats would surround the steamboats and ferry passengers and freight to Banty's Wharf. In 1907 Steamboat Wharf, a freestanding wharf in the middle of the harbor, was built for more convenient unloading. With the disappearance of the steamboats in the 1930s, Banty's Wharf fell into disrepair, and the great storm of August 1933 destroyed it and the buildings associated with this once thriving commercial port on the island.

Main Ridge Road ends where Factory Road heads west connecting Main Ridge with West Ridge. Factory Road takes its name from a shirt factory that was located on the marsh between the two bridges in the 1920s. The factory burned about 1927, but part of its concrete foundation is still visible. The first and larger of the two bridges that span Big Gut is called the Hoistin' Bridge, a modern bridge that replaced an earlier one with an opening in its center to allow boats with tall masts to pass.

West Ridge, as its name implies, is the westernmost ridge that defines the inhabitable portion of Tangier Island. Stretching north-south for about one mile, West Ridge is divided into a northern extent known as Sheep Hill and a southern portion called Hog Ridge. Both names likely derive from the early use of the ridge for livestock grazing and tending before or during early European settlement of the island in the eighteenth century. Hog Ridge Road extends to the southern end of West Ridge where footpaths and bridges lead to Tangier Beach, a narrow spit of land that once extended more than a mile to the south, but has steadily eroded away over the years to within half of a mile, ending in a point instead of the hook that once characterized this lonely stretch of beach. The southern section of the Island was populated with trees in the nineteenth century and it served as the site for religious camp meetings and the British Fort Albion from 1813 to 1815. The fort site is now well south of the current island, in the Bay. The exact site has not been located.

West Ridge Road is lined by mostly houses dating from the last half of the twentieth century, a pumping station, the Town Office, the island's airstrip (dating to 1968-1969 and not included in the historic district boundary), and the sites of three stores that once served the residents of this ridge. At the end of West Ridge Road facing Factory Lane is the site of the William T. Crockett Store which was operated for many years by the island's mayor. Across the road was the store's older competitor, Crockett and Wallace Store. The third store on the ridge was located on West Ridge Road facing Wallace Road. The J. E. Wallace & Co. Store was established by John Wallace (1855-1926) who came to Tangier in the 1870s. The largest store on the island, according to an old photo, it was a late-nineteenth- or early-twentieth-century, frame, hippedroofed building with a long front porch. It sold groceries, general merchandise, and coffins as Wallace was also an undertaker and had a "coffin house" as an adjacent building on the property. After his father's retirement in 1921, Sidney S. Wallace opened the Wallacedale Theatre, the island's first movie house, after constructing a stage, seats, and booths and installing a projector at the western end of the store. The Wallacedale closed shortly after Wallace's death in 1936 and it was torn down in the 1940s. Another theatre known as The Grand located across from the Methodist Church continued to show movies until around 1960; it was demolished shortly thereafter.

The Sidney S. Wallace House (16408 West Ridge Road), built in 1904, is one of the most well preserved Late Victorian houses on the island. Set back from the road and surrounded by a picket fence and a gated entrance with a trellis above, it is a two-and-a-half-story frame and vinyl-sided dwelling with a tall central front gable featuring a round-arched attic window. Rare for the island is the distinctive wraparound porch which has a heavy balustrade and turned posts flanked by elaborate sawnwork. A corbelled brick chimney rises above the tall gable roof. The house and its associated buildings are now operated as the Bay View Inn.

North of the Wallace House is a modern residence that stands on the site of the Joshua Thomas House (4300 Joshua Thomas Lane) where the "Parson of the Islands" lived from 1799 to about 1825. One of his grandsons built a succeeding house on the site, one of the island's oldest surviving houses until it was torn down in the 1980s. An undated photo of the dwelling shows a simple, two-story, frame house with a one-story wing to the north, a gable roof clad in wooden shingles, and tall interior-end brick chimneys.

The small building opposite the site of the Joshua Thomas house is the Tangier Town Office (4301 Joshua Thomas Lane) which was moved from north of the airstrip to its present location. It was originally used as a spotting station for the U. S. Navy's target range on the southwestern side of the island where target ships were placed for bombing practice by aircraft.

A few houses on West Ridge Road are worthy of mention. They represent the development of the island in the 1950s when several houses were built on the ridges. One of the best examples is the house at 16538 West Ridge Road. Built around 1950, it is a one-story, frame and vinyl-sided, Colonial Revival-style dwelling with a tall gable roof, a projecting gabled pavilion with a lunette in the gable, a central entrance with a stoop, and paired and tripled multi-pane (replaced) windows. A ubiquitous picket fence surrounds a generous front lawn.

Harbor Area Resources

Shanties

The Mailboat and North Channel harbors are populated with about 60-80 crab shanty structures. Each wood structure is rectangular in plan, consisting of a deck, set atop pilings, with a one-story frame shed at one end. The designs vary in size and configuration. Some of the shanties are accessible directly from land, but most of them are arrayed along both sides of the harbor channels (a few are in more remote locations around the Island). Watermen access the shanties by small outboard motor boats. All shanties are long enough to accommodate the traditional Chesapeake Bay Deadrise boats, the larger craft used for crab, oyster, and fish harvesting and travel in open waters. The shanties have enough deck room for watermen to stack crab pots, and the sheds are used for equipment storage. Some of the shanty structures also include floating tanks at dock level (above the harbor water). The floating tanks are long rectangular pools where pot-harvested crabs are stored and watched until they molt (slough off their shell). The recently molted crabs are the desired soft shell crabs, packed in seaweed lined boxes, and shipped to market. Each of these pools has a water circulation system, driven by a pump. The tanks are occasionally stacked two levels high and shaded with simple frame gable-roof covers. The tank system of harvesting soft shell crabs developed in the 1950s, and by the 1960s, the shanty structures were built around this more reliable approach. Before the 1950s, there were few shanties in the harbor, instead, there were several wooden pen structures that protected rectangular floats that sat directly in harbor water. The watermen watched their crabs from their boats or low level decks, just beside the float boxes. The old shedding float box method was precarious when waters became rough and during major storm events. Watermen would lose many, or all, of their crabs when floats were washed over or upset. Most of the current shanties date to the 1970s and later. The shanties are often rebuilt or modified due to harsh weather conditions, and thus are counted as a single resource in the inventory at the end of Section 7. While as a group these resources are non-contributing, they are important to the historic district's overall watermen setting.

Piers and Docks

About a dozen boat piers and docks line the harbor edges of the Mailboat and North Channel harbors. These landing and mooring areas are privately owned with the exception of one public pier. There are sheds, shanties, and larger storehouses dotting the shoreline. A few of these buildings and structures are noted in the architectural resources inventory at the end of Section 7, but docks and piers are not. While some of these structures stand in locations where boats have docked and moored for over 150 years, the current structures are typically less than thirty years old. The wood docks and piers are rebuilt frequently due to the heavy wear and weathering. Because they are frequently rebuilt and reconfigured, the piers and docks are counted as a single resource in the architectural inventory at the end of Section 7. As a group, these structures are non-contributing due to age of materials, but they are critical resources for the historic district's watermen setting.

Canals and Harbor Circulation Networks

Tangier Island has had two primary harbors that have developed since the mid-nineteenth century. In the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, when the island's residents farmed and kept livestock, travel on the Chesapeake Bay would have been by smaller sailing or rowing craft. The water depth around the Island was very shallow so any larger vessel had to moor off shore and travel to the island on small craft. A protected harbor for larger vessels did not exist. As the watermen developed the commercial seafood trade in the second half of the nineteenth century, the Mailboat Harbor, on the northeast side of the Island's Meat Soup section, became the primary location of the smaller shallow draft fishing boats of that period, log canoes, bugeyes, and pungys. Banty's Wharf, at the extreme southern end of Main Ridge Road, developed when steamboat travel was initiated in 1884. Due to the shallow waters on all sides of the islands, steamboats moored off the southern shore, off Whale Point in Cod Harbor, and passengers and freight were carried by smaller boat to Banty's Wharf at the southern end of Main Ridge Road. The Mailboat Harbor channel was dredged for larger craft in 1917-1918 and the channel was widened in 1922. By the 1920s, there was a mix of sail and motor craft used for travel and commerce. The first motor craft appeared in c. 1905. Steamboat travel ceased by the 1950s and Banty's wharf fell into disuse. In 1967, the North Channel (also referred to as the West Channel) was created. Much of the dredge material was used for fill in creating the airport on the western marshy area of the Island. This channel goes through an area that was once a settlement known as Oyster Creek. The settlement and land in this area had eroded away well before the channel was constructed.

The harbors are critical elements of the historic setting. The North Channel is a second point of access to the Mailboat Harbor, and a harbor area has now developed on the Channel. Shanties, piers, and docks now extend well west of the Mailboat Harbor, towards the North Channel. The Island's primary boatyard (referred to as the Railway) is located near the mouth of the Channel.

Tangier Island has an extensive system of manmade canals. These are access points for smaller boats and could have easily accommodated the watermen's log canoes (small log-built sailboats or rowboats). There are long access canals on West Ridge Creek and Canton Creek, and these large canals extend through the marshes, with outlets to open water. Numerous small canals extend from the rear property line edges as individual small boat access points into the marshes. Most of these were created since the nineteenth century. Many watermen had their individual backyard water access. The creeks through the marshes provided easy and protected access to either Steamboat or Mailboat harbors. The watermen also harvested crabs and other marine life from the immediate marsh areas. These manmade structures are a critical part of the historic landscape and setting.

Archaeology Resources Summary

The archaeology resources summary is based on survey work and the resulting report: An Assessment of Cultural Resource Potential within "Uppards" and Goose Island, Tangier Island, Accomack County, Virginia, by Richards, Lily A., and John P. Cooke, Cultural Resources Inc., 2003. Additional sections have been added by DHR Archaeologist Joanna Wilson Green. She conducted survey and site excavations on Uppards at the Canaan cemetery in April 2013.

Prehistoric Archaeology

Like that of the Mid-Atlantic Region in general, Virginia's prehistoric cultural chronology is divided into three time periods: Paleoindian (prior to 8000 B.C.), Archaic (8000-1200 B.C.), and Woodland (1200 B.C.-1600 A.D.). These divisions reflect dramatic changes in subsistence methods, settlement, and social patterns as reflected in material cultural remains. The Archaic and Woodland periods are further divided into Early, Middle, and Late, with these internal classifications based on smaller (but no less important) changes. The prehistoric use and occupation of Tangier Island may, as a result, be seen as something of a cultural microclimate reflective of the larger patterns of use documented in coastal areas along both sides of the Chesapeake Bay.

This use was likely affected by the unusual natural environment presented by this island – geographic isolation, low topographic profile, sandy unproductive soils, tidal marshes, storm vulnerability, sea level fluctuation, and erosion. The island's sandy soils and tidal surges are not suited to agriculture. This restriction, along with the lack of a surface source of fresh water, renders the island not conducive to long-term occupation. These same conditions, however, would have provided a rich variety of fish, shellfish, birds, and marine mammals, encouraging repeated use of the island over time for procurement of these resources.

Repeated, short-term human occupation of Tangier Island over the course of these three cultural periods has been strongly suggested by both professional archaeological investigations and local residents' collections of artifacts.

Archaeological site 44AC0524, which occupies the western shore of the Uppards portion of Tangier Island, has reportedly produced at least two fluted points. This would appear to indicate that, at the least, the island was used for food procurement purposes during this period. Tangier Island residents have also reported finding Paleoindian projectile points on the island's beaches, several of which tools were viewed and tentatively identified by professional archaeologists.

Multiple projectile points and other tools typical of the Archaic period also were identified in Island residents' collections, although a site dating from this period has not yet been identified. Similar materials have been recovered from nearby Watts Island (currently a federal wildlife preserve), suggesting that during this period Tangier Island and its neighbor provided a source of marine food sources for native groups living on the Eastern Shore of Virginia.

Local collectors' assemblages contain both Woodland lithic tools and ceramics, indicating that the island remained a source for resource procurement throughout this period. Similar materials have been recovered from Watts Island. Although, as Richardson and Cooke (2003) note, the Tangier Island collections skew toward projectile points with few sherds included, this is likely the result of the collectors' personal interest rather than the prevalence of one artifact type over another. As previously stated, the island's lack of fresh water would render it unlikely that long-term occupation took place. It is probable, however, that targeted archaeological investigation would result in the identification of buried deposits associated with shorter occupations.

Historic Archaeology

Uppards Cemetery

The Uppards Cemetery (44AC0571), located at the northernmost tip of Tangier Island, is the only archaeological site on the island subjected to professional excavation. The cemetery is associated with a settlement known as Canaan (or Canaan Ridge), once located on the northeastern edge of the island. Although no photographs of Canaan are known to exist, interviews with local residents indicate that it included its own school, church, and store, along with the homes of several families. The village was abandoned in the second quarter of the 20th century, and its residents relocated to the existing town of Tangier, leaving their buried dead behind.

The presence of the Uppards Cemetery was first brought to the attention of the Virginia Department of Historic Resources in 2012, following the discovery that recent storms had exposed graves and strewn coffin hardware across the beach. Department archaeologists visited the island in December 2012 and recovered one set of human remains from the most exposed interment. Department archaeologists returned in April 2013 to recover an additional four interments from the rapidly eroding beach. Scattered coffin hardware was also recovered from the shoreline. Currently the remains of four adults and one child are undergoing conservation treatment at the Department's laboratory, in preparation for further specialized analysis to be performed at the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of Natural History. An unknown number of additional interments remain in place, although erosion presents an ongoing threat to the remainder of the cemetery.

Several displaced funerary monuments were found on the beach, all simple white marble tablet-style markers with associated footstones. Death dates range from 1895 to 1912. The adult individuals were buried in wooden coffins, and placed with their heads to the west. The adults' coffins were severely eroded, with only fragments of water-saturated wood remaining. Coffin hardware was uniform, however, and included two sets of decorative swing-bale handles with escutcheons, bales, and end caps made of molded white metal, and handles of wood. A few decorative thumbscrews and other smaller hardware pieces, also of white metal, were recovered as well. A partial white metal escutcheon that may have originally contained a nameplate was found over the lower torso of one female. In contrast, the child's coffin was nearly intact, although the lid had collapsed. Hexagonal in shape, the coffin had two sets of white metal swingbale handles, as well as small decorative copper bosses at each corner and a larger boss at the center of the head and foot panels. Vestiges of paint indicate that the coffin was painted white or another pale color. The interior was likely padded, as several decorative star-shaped, copperalloy pushpins were recovered from the interior fill. The hexagonal coffin was enclosed within a slightly larger, rectangular container that did not appear to have any hardware. The adults – three females and one male – appear to have been interred simply, with no elaborate jewelry or clothing items. One female had two plastic tortoiseshell-pattern side combs and hairpin, and another a plastic, tortoiseshell-pattern "back comb" situated at the rear of the cranium. A similar "back comb" was recovered from the beach by a local resident. All interments produced a variety of glass, shell, and gutta percha buttons. One female exhibited copper staining on the bones of the third finger of the left hand, probably associated with a copper-alloy ring. Examination of the child's remains resulted in the recovery of a small quantity of clear glass beads, possibly from a necklace or beaded item of clothing, as well as one post-style earring with a paste gem.

Interestingly, examination of soils from the torsos of the adults produced a quantity of lead "bird shot." As ducks, geese, and other waterfowl would have presented a good source of protein for Island residents, it is likely that the shot was ingested accidentally, a theory supported by the differential size of the shot (possibly resulting from erosion within the gut). This population's geographic isolation encouraged a specific diet, including reliance on marine proteins, and further analysis of the remains may produce information about the effects of dietary restrictions on bone development and other indicators of health.

Canaan, Reubentown, and Persimmon Ridge

Review of a 1917 topographic map that includes Tangier and Goose Islands indicates three separate settlements on the Uppards section of Tangier Island. A 1942 topographic map shows none (USGS). Today, the only recorded vestige of the village of Canaan, once located at the very northernmost tip of the island, is the previously described Uppards Cemetery and a brick-lined well located on the beach nearby. Pedestrian survey of the beaches in this area resulted in the identification of artifacts consistent with the late 18th through early 20th centuries, including dark green bottle glass, glazed and unglazed redware, salt-glazed stoneware, ceramic doorknobs, and pressed glass. The presence of these items is consistent with the historic occupation of the village of Canaan and with the understanding that it was abandoned in the early 20th century.

Review of modern satellite photographs indicates the presence of multiple earthen dikes in the general locations of Reubentown and Persimmon Ridge. These dikes, enclosing relatively large rectangular areas, may indicate the location of house sites, gardens, or animal enclosures. Long, diked causeways appear to link a few of the enclosures to one another or to the coastline. Barring further investigation the function of these enclosures and causeways remains conjectural. Their presence, however, is a visual reminder of the historic occupation of Uppards.

To date, two archaeological sites within Tangier Island Historic District have been documented, with one also subjected to excavation by professional archaeologists. The island's lengthy period of human occupation and the array of artifacts in local collectors' possession suggest that more sites are likely to exist but have not yet been identified.

44AC0524 Uppards-Western Shore/ Paleoindian Period Contributing site

Located on the western shore of the Uppards portion of Tangier Island, archaeological site 44AC0524 has reportedly produced at least two fluted points. The site confirms early marine life harvesting by indigenous peoples of the Chesapeake Bay, and investigations to date suggest the site has further potential for research for the Paleoindian period.

44AC0571 Uppards Cemetery-Northern Shore/First Quarter of 20th Century Contributing Site

The historic cemetery is a site within the former Canaan settlement, the largest of the four settlements on Uppards. The burials are associated with residents in the settlements and families on the southern area of the Island. Canaan was abandoned in 1928.

In addition to the two contributing sites described above, the historic district includes 9 small cemeteries that are contributing sites. There also are two non-contributing sites, both small cemeteries, which postdate the district's period of significance. The cemeteries are included in the table of architectural resources, provided below, because each has architectural elements such as fencing, markers, or other treatments.

Architectural Physical Integrity/Moved Resources

Tangier Island architecture tends to be more evolved with replacement materials and there are a high number of buildings that have been moved. These aspects and the physical environment show the challenges posed by maintaining buildings on a relatively isolated island. The current architecture of Tangier Island spans from the 1880s to present. About 115 buildings date from the early period: 1880 to 1930. Given the challenges in the often severe weather of the Chesapeake Bay, it is significant that these early buildings have survived at all. The Island has been repeatedly submerged or battered by storms, the most notable in 1889, 1896, 1933, and most recently, Hurricane Sandy in 2012. In many of these events large sections of land are flooded. Due to the severe conditions, materials have been updated more frequently and building foundations have been rebuilt or raised overtime. Additionally, the frequency of moved buildings within the historic district's period of significance is high. The Uppards settlements were abandoned by the late 1920s. Rather than leaving the houses behind, many were barged or rolled to the southern area to be sited in the Meat Soup area, adjacent to the Mailboat Harbor. In the architectural inventory below, the attribution of contributing and non-contributing status took in account the challenges of maintaining historic materials in an isolated area that is subject to severe weather conditions.

Architectural Inventory

The following inventory lists the contributing and non-contributing resources within the Tangier Island Historic District. It is organized alphabetically by street name and then numerically by street number. Each entry provides the VDHR file number, resource name (if applicable)/current use, address, date of construction, architectural style, number of stories, whether it is a primary or secondary resource on the property, and the contributing status within the district. When a property has multiple resources, the first entry for the property denotes the primary resource and secondary building structures are listed immediately below and without DHR numbers to facilitate their association with the primary resource. Whether a resource is considered contributing or non-contributing was determined based on its integrity as it supports the historic district's areas and period of significance. Resources that post-date the period of significance are non-contributing. Locations of resources are marked on the attached sketch maps entitled "Tangier Island Historic District, 309-0001 Contributing/Non-Contributing Status Map," using the last four digits of the DHR ID number as shown in the first column of the table below.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph (Provide a summary paragraph that includes level of significance, applicable criteria, justification for the period of significance, and any applicable criteria considerations.)

The Tangier Island Historic District is significant at the state level of significance under Criterion A in the areas of Commerce, Ethnic Heritage: Native American, Ethnic Heritage: African American, Industry, Maritime, Military, and Religion. The district is significant at the local level under Criterion C in the area of Architecture and under Criterion D in the areas of Archaeology-Prehistoric and Archaeology-Historic. The district's period of significance is c. 8000 B.C.-1964. The beginning date represents the earliest archaeological data recovered at sites in the Uppards area and continues through the periodic human habitation that occurred within the historic district from the Paleonindian period through Native American contact with Europeans in the seventeenth century. European settlement commenced significant trends and patterns of development through the end date of the period of significance in 1964; this end date acknowledges that historic activities continued to have importance within the last fifty years.

Named the "Russell Isles" by John Smith in 1608, Tangier Island is Virginia's unique Chesapeake Bay watermen's community. Successive groups of prehistoric indigenous people harvested marine life and other resources here for millennia, a tradition maintained through contact with European explorers during the 17th century. The extensive shoreline site on the uninhabited Uppards section of the island indicates substantial Native American activity (DHR Site #44AC0524). Europeans used the island for raising livestock in the 17th and 18th centuries; the vestiges of this period exist in the neighborhood names: Hog Ridge and Sheep Hill. While livestock overseers may have been resident on the island as early as the seventeenth century, the first recorded settlement did not occur until 1778, when Joseph Crockett bought 475 acres of land. By 1800 the census showed that there were 79 people on Tangier, most of them Crocketts or their descendants. The name Crockett remains one of the most common today, along with Pruitt, Parks, Eskridge, Thomas, Dawes, Dise, Marshall, Charnock, and Shores. Many of these settlers emigrated from Cornwall and Devon areas of England, possibly the origin of the unique spoken accent shared by today's Tangierians. Along with the tradition of maritime activity, the culture of the Island was heavily influenced by Joshua Thomas, a Methodist minister, who became a resident on the Island in 1804. The Swain Memorial United Methodist Church is a landmark institution on the Island, an extension of Thomas's legacy. The Island's Revolutionary War, War of 1812, and Civil War history is unusual in the Virginia context. The British Fort Albion, dating to 1814, is a potential site located in the Chesapeake Bay, off the southern end of the Island but has not yet been professionally investigated.

The harvesting of oysters and fish became the Island's primary economic activity starting in the 1840s. In the late 19th century, oysters and blue crabs became the primary commercial export to mostly northern markets, especially to Baltimore and New York City. By 1900, over 1000 people lived on the Island. Today, it remains Virginia's only watermen community largely dependent on seafood commerce, with about 60-70 watermen using the traditional Deadrise boats (the official boat of Virginia). The North Channel and the Mailboat Harbor are dotted with 60-70 crab shanties. The tradition is kept alive by Tangierians like Jerry Pruitt, a lifelong Tangier waterman, who owns the last active Chesapeake Bay buy boat, the "Delvin K" (built 1949).

Prehistoric Overview of Tangier Island

The following overview is based on survey work and the resulting report: An Assessment of Cultural Resource Potential within "Uppards" and Goose Island, Tangier Island, Accomack County, Virginia, by Richards, Lily A., and John P. Cooke, Cultural Resources Inc., 2003. Additional sections have been added by DHR Archaeologist Joanna Wilson Green, who conducted survey and site excavations on Uppards at the Canaan cemetery in April 2013.

Like that of the Mid-Atlantic Region in general, Virginia's prehistoric cultural chronology is divided into three time periods: Paleoindian (prior to 8000 B.C.), Archaic (8000-1200 B.C.), and Woodland (1200 B.C.-1600 A.D.). These divisions reflect dramatic changes in subsistence methods, settlement, and social patterns as reflected in material cultural remains. The Archaic and Woodland periods are further divided into Early, Middle, and Late, with these internal classifications based on smaller (but no less important) changes.

Investigating these cultural periods in the immediate vicinity of Tangier Island is complicated by the numerous oscillations in sea level that have occurred in the past 20,000 years. At this time, sea level was approximately 100 meters lower than today with continental shelves exposed worldwide. With the end of the last glacial epoch, melting of continental glaciers caused sea level to rise, submerging continental shelves by 15,000 years ago. Major sea level rises occurred between 7,500 to 5,000 years ago and between 5,000 to 3,000 years ago. Since then, sea level has risen about 6 inches per century, and accordingly the area of Tangier Island above sea level has steadily decreased. Evidence of prehistoric cultural occupation of the island thus may be inundated.

Paleoindian (Prior to 8000 B.C.)

The majority of Paleoindian remains in Virginia are represented by isolated projectile point finds and what appear to be small temporary camps. While some larger and very notable base camps have been identified, they are relatively rare and usually associated with sources of preferred high quality lithic materials. Although a few archaeological sites in this region have produced earlier radiocarbon dates, human occupation of the Mid-Atlantic is generally believed to have begun approximately 10-12,000 years ago. This occupation, known as the Paleoindian, is characterized by the presence of distinctive, fluted projectile points, and small temporary camps. Most current views hold that eastern Paleoindians were generalized foragers with an emphasis on hunting. Social organization apparently consisted of relatively small bands that exploited a wide but defined territory. Paleoindian sites tend to be located at or near the confluence of rivers, estuaries, and coastal wetlands, indicating a reliance on the plant, animal, and bird species supported by these environments. It should be noted that during this period much of the earth's water was confined within the Laurentide and Cordilleran ice sheets. As such, sea levels in the Bay and along Tangier Island were several feet lower than they are at present. The possibility of inundated Paleoindian sites in the immediate vicinity of the historic district is, as a result, considerable.

The Paleoindian "tool kit" in the Mid-Atlantic includes well-made formal tools (bifaces, scrapers) made using locally-sourced materials. Tangier Island residents have reported finding Paleoindian projectile points on the island's beaches, several of which tools were viewed and tentatively identified by professional archaeologists. Material types observed in the projectile points collected by citizens of Tangier Island cover a wide variety of sources. There are the abundant quartz, quartzite, and other siliceous slates. More exotic material types include various types of cherts, including chalcedony, jasper, and various black and gray cherts. Some projectile points also appear to be made of rhyolites and some metasedimentary stones.

Archaeological sites with possible Paleoindian components also have been identified in the general vicinity of Tangier Island. Nearby Watts Island, currently a federal wildlife preserve, contains multiple archaeological sites which have apparently produced fluted points (all were identified in the possession of nonprofessional local collectors).

Archaic (8000 - 1200 B.C.)

The transition between the Paleoindian and Archaic time periods was marked by a major environmental shift, from the cold and wet of the Pleistocene to a warmer and drier Holocene. Sea levels began to rise as the ice sheets melted, creating new shorelines. The megafauna characteristic of the previous epoch disappeared. Increased seasonality gave rise to mixed deciduous/coniferous forest as well as the prevalence of different plant, animal, and bird species better adapted to the changing climate. By the end of the Archaic, sea levels had largely stabilized, and the marine environment now recognized as the Chesapeake Bay was established.

This shift in climate resulted in a change in human practice in the Mid-Atlantic region. As in the previous period, the Archaic is characterized by small, mobile occupations. However, these occupations appear to have been seasonal in nature and groups may have occasionally split into smaller "microbands," dispersing to take advantage of more temporarily available resources.

Given the warmer climate, these resources would have encouraged an increasing reliance on plant foods, including nuts and seeds, in addition to hunting. The Archaic tool kit also changed, with the finely-made fluted points of the Paleoindian period giving way to a wider variety of projectile and bifacial tools, many with side or corner notches to facilitate hafting to shafts or handles. Grinding tools, such as nutting stones and mutates, begin to appear during this time period, again reinforcing the idea of greater reliance on fibrous plant foods. Vessels made of stone (most often steatite or soapstone) also appear in the archaeological record. The end of the Archaic period in this region is characterized by increased dependence on marine food sources, settlement near estuaries, marshes, etc., and population growth.

As with the Paleoindian, review of materials within the private collections of Tangier Island residents found multiple projectile points and other tools typical of the Archaic period. The presence of similar materials reported to have been recovered from nearby Watts Island was confirmed through inspection of local collectors' assemblages, further supporting the conclusion that Tangier Island and its neighbor continued to provide a source of marine food sources for native groups living on the Eastern Shore of Virginia.

Woodland (1200 B.C. – A.D. 1600)

The transition between the Archaic and Woodland periods in the Mid-Atlantic region is marked by a significant change in technology – the development of ceramics. Lightweight and easily replaceable, ceramics made the storage and transportation of water, food, and other items much simpler. Ceramic vessels also tolerated direct heat, allowing food to be cooked directly over the fire. Increasing variety in form and style of ceramic vessels characterizes the Woodland period. The early Woodland period in the Chesapeake Bay area is also characterized by the development of ritualism, most often displayed in burial practices. Increased trade in exotic items and materials from distant locations, and marked rise in both population size and sedentism are also common to this period. The increasing reliance on agriculture characteristic of the Woodland period in other locations does not, however, appear to be prevalent on the Delmarva Peninsula.

The middle Woodland period was marked by climate change, with the Mid-Atlantic area in general becoming steadily warmer and drier. In the Bay area, an increase in the incidence of shell middens indicates increased emphasis on exploitation of bivalves as a food source. Ceremonial burial became more prevalent in the northern Bay area during the Middle Woodland period, as represented by individual burials with a wide variety of funerary offerings, including both decorative and functional objects. Ceremonial burial in Virginia appears to have taken the form of mound or accretional group burials, many of which have been identified in the western valleys and along the southern coastal plain. Although a search of available data for the coastal areas of northern Virginia found no recorded instances of ceremonial burial, it may be assumed that this is due to a data gap rather than the absence of the cultural trend in this region.

The late Woodland in the Bay area is characterized by the development of bow and arrow technology, increased population size and settlement along major rivers and estuaries, and continued reliance on marine and estuarine resources. Rountree and Davidson (1997) state that the Late Woodland occupants of the Eastern Shore utilized maize agriculture as of the first contact period with Europeans, but it is unclear how large a role agriculture played in subsistence prior to that period. Mass burial in ossuary features, several of which have been recorded in Virginia's coastal areas, is characteristic of this period, as are the protection of settlement areas with defensive palisades.

Local collectors' assemblages contain both Woodland lithic tools and ceramics, indicating that the island remained a source for resource procurement throughout this period. Similar materials have been recovered from Watts Island. Although, as Richardson and Cooke (2003) note, the Tangier Island collections skew toward projectile points with few sherds included, this is likely the result of the collectors' personal interest rather than the prevalence of one artifact type over another. As previously stated, the island's lack of fresh water would render it unlikely that long-term occupation took place. It is probable, however, that targeted archaeological investigation would result in the identification of buried deposits associated with shorter occupations.

Contact (1608)

Although there is some documentary evidence indicating that French and Spanish explorers arrived on the Delmarva Peninsula and encountered its original residents at intervals through the 16th and 17th centuries, the most comprehensive documentation of early contact in Virginia between Native Americans and Europeans comes from the diaries of Captain John Smith. Smith, who explored the Chesapeake Bay and the Eastern Shore of Virginia in 1608, documented the presence of two native villages (Accowmack and Accohannock). He was likely unaware of multiple other, smaller settlements in this vicinity.

The earliest recorded mention of Tangier Island is found in Smith's diaries, which identify it as one of what he named the "Russell Isles" during his travels north along the Chesapeake Bay in 1608. Smith indicates that a storm forced him and his crew to take shelter on one of the "Russell Isles," but his own description renders it impossible to determine whether it was Tangier or Goose Island. His diary entry does, however, indicate that the islands he encountered were unoccupied, supporting the theory that these features were used for resource procurement but not necessarily settlement.

Native Americans remained in the vicinity through the seventeenth century, although their numbers and lifeways were devastated by European incursions into their traditional territories. For example, in 1607, John Smith was taken as a captive to Werowocomoco at Purtan Bay in present-day Gloucester County, which then was the center of power of the Powhatan paramount chiefdom. Occupied since the 13th century, Werowocomoco was abandoned shortly thereafter. Despite the extreme dislocations experienced by Virginia Indians after contact with Europeans, tribes such as the Mattaponi and Pamunkey survived and adapted.

To date, the extent and nature of tribal use of Tangier Island after the early seventeenth century has not been fully explored. The first documented permanent European settlement of the island would not take place until the late 18th century, although Europeans began including the island in their holdings by 1634.

Historic Overview of Tangier Island

The following historic overview is based on survey work and the resulting report: An Assessment of Cultural Resource Potential within "Uppards" and Goose Island, Tangier Island, Accomack County, Virginia, by Richards, Lily A. and John P. Cooke, Cultural Resources Inc., 2003. Additional sections have been added by DHR Architectural Historian Marc Wagner.

European Settlement to Society (1607 - 1750)

The aforementioned incident of June 1608, when Captain Smith encountered a storm and took shelter on one of the Russell Isles, is the first and only documented instance of European incursion in the vicinity during the early 17th century. Smith's own description of the landing is insufficient to ascertain exactly on which of the several Russell Isles he landed.

Accomack County, of which Tangier Island is a part, was organized in 1634 and at that time included the entire Delmarva Peninsula. While Virginia's Eastern Shore was developed by tobacco planters, Tangier Island remained uninhabited. It was not until 1670 that tavern keeper Ambrose White patented land on the island. In 1671, White turned the property over to Charles Scarburgh and John West. However, while the historical record is murky, tradition holds that none of these men actually lived on the Island with their families and in fact, used the patents as grazing land for their livestock. It is possible that there were tenants living on the land watching over the property and caring for the livestock, but there is no historical record of this and any statements made would be only conjecture. The most that can be said about pre-American Revolution Tangier Island is that it had indeed become part of the holdings of the wealthy families of the Eastern Shore, that it was used for livestock grazing, and that there were no families known to be living on the island prior to 1778.

One notable event was recorded in the early seventeenth century. Following paramount chief Opechancanough's 1644 organized attacks against the English colonists for encroaching on Indian lands, Governor William Berkeley led further military strikes against the Virginia Indians in July 1645, taking many prisoners. On August 9th, the Virginia Council decided to transport all the Indian male prisoners more than 11 years of age to Tangier Island "to prevent their returning to and strengthening their respective tribes." Berkeley's own ship transported the prisoners to Tangier, where they were abandoned. Their fate was not recorded.

Colonial, Early National, and Antebellum Periods (1750 - 1860)

For most of the Colonial and Early National periods, the Tangierians were farmers, living and working on the several ridges that made up Tangier, Uppards, and Goose islands. During the Colonial and Early Republic periods, those ridges consisted of Main, West, Canton, Oyster Creek, Canaan, Persimmons (also known as Cinnamon), Sheeps Hill, Ruben Town (also spelled Rubin Town and Ruebentown) and East Point.

A few families constituted the majority of Tangier's population. The first known family to settle permanently on Tangier Island was the Crocketts, a family who still play an influential part in island life today. Joseph Crockett, who had formerly lived on Smith Island, purchased 450 acres on Tangier in 1778. He moved to the island with his wife Sally and their ten children. The family made their home on the ridge known both historically and today as Canton. By 1800, the population had grown to 79, of which 30 were Crocketts. Other families on the Island, most of whom are still represented in the population today, were the Pruitts, Parks, Wheatleys, Thomases, and Dizes. The families built their houses mainly of wood, set on brick piers, on those ridges high enough above water to protect them from marshy conditions and high tide.

During the Revolutionary War, Tangier Island was subject to raids by both the British and the Americans. Neither strongly loyalists nor revolutionary, the Tangierians were often forced to barter with whichever ships happened to be patrolling their shores. In addition, the inlets and isolated location of the Island made it attractive to roving bands of loyalist "picaroons" as well as revolutionaries. By the fall of 1780, picaroon raids had become so frequent that the Virginia authorities began pursuing picaroon ships in the vicinity of Tangier Island. At least 5 schooners were captured between October 1780 and the end of the war.

In addition, the Islanders were governed by the same wartime regulations as all other colonists, and Tangier was given a procurement quota of cured beef and dairy products just like the rest of Virginia. Several Tangier families were represented in the Virginia Militia, including the Parks, Evens, Levin and Williams families.

After the war, the Islanders returned to their life of farming and herding, remaining largely isolated from the rest of Virginia. In the early nineteenth century, a Methodist church was established on Tangier and the Islanders began, in 1808, hosting religious "Camp Meetings" on the southern area of the Island, an area that is now likely in the Chesapeake Bay. Religion and these meetings were heavily influenced by Joshua Thomas, who became the religious leader and unofficial historian of the people of Tangier for the next half-century.

Peace did not last long on Tangier, and in 1814, during the War of 1812, the invading British troops made Tangier their base of operations for their attack on Baltimore. Though the British at Fort Albion treated the Tangierians in a generally friendly and non-threatening manner, when the commander of the British troops on the Island asked Joshua Thomas to bless the troops, he did so, but warned them that the offensive against Baltimore was doomed to fail. The number of British troops at Fort Albion, at the southern reaches of the Island (a site now below sea level), most likely fluctuated, but could have been more than one thousand men. Impressment of Americans into British service and the violation of American ships were among the war's causes. Beginning in 1813, Virginians suffered from a British naval blockade of the Chesapeake Bay and from British troops' plundering the countryside by the Bay and along the James, Rappahannock, and Potomac rivers. The Virginia militia deflected a British attempt to take Norfolk in 1813, and engaged British forces throughout the war.

During the war, thousands of enslaved African Americans gained freedom by fighting for the British or serving as guides during British raids on coastal communities. Many were given the choice of enlisting in the armed services or settling in various locations throughout the British Empire. On Tangier Island, at the British base of Fort Albion, the British trained African Americans to serve in the Colonial Marines. From Fort Albion, the Colonial Marines, along with British troops, engaged the Virginia militia in numerous landings along the Northern Neck and the Eastern Shore throughout the summer of 1814. By the end of the war, more than 2,000 enslaved African Americans in Virginia had gained their freedom aboard British ships.

After the War of 1812, the people of Tangier continued doing what many Virginians of the time were doing, farming and eking out a living. By 1820, at which time the population of the Island was 74 (35 white males, 38 white females and 1 black female), census records indicate that oystering was replacing farming as the main commercial activity on the Island. By 1860, heavily influenced by the railroad's arrival in Crisfield, Maryland, and refrigerated cars, the Chesapeake was supplying as much as half the world's oysters.

Tangier continued to be a religious community, and in 1838, the first church building was established. When, in 1844 the Methodist Episcopal Church split over the question of slavery, Tangier's church joined the northern denominations, believing that slavery was inherently wrong. This choice would guide the Island's attitude toward the Civil War.

Civil War (1861 - 1865)

In 1860, the population of Tangier Island numbered 411 people, including six "free negroes," according to census data. When, on May 23, 1861, the Virginia Ordinance of Secession was put before the people, Tangier chose not to secede. Though the exact vote is not known, Tangier remained part of the Union throughout the War. The Civil War brought the same types of problems to Tangier as had the two previous wars, with the Chesapeake blockaded by the Union and the isolation of Tangier proving a tempting arena for smugglers who carried on commerce with Virginia. However, in general, the Civil War had limited effect on the Island.

Reconstruction and Growth, World War I to World War II, and The New Dominion (1866 - Present)

In 1866, a cholera epidemic broke out on Tangier Island. While the total number of dead is not known, at least twelve people died during the epidemic, and possibly as many as 24 of the 408 who called the Island home at that time.

While the rest of Virginia was recovering from the Civil War, Tangier was sharing in the economic boom in the North. This was partially due to the development of the steam-canning process, which allowed Tangierians to ship oysters all over the country. In fact, the Islanders had a small processing plant for processing fish by-product on the southern end the Island. This boom was further enhanced when the Eastern Shore Railroad built track as far as Crisfield, Maryland, just 12 short miles from Tangier. The period's economic prosperity led to improved economic conditions for the Islanders. People were occupying the ridges in greater numbers, and the land was continually subdivided into smaller and smaller lots, which created a much more closely knit community.

By the turn of the twentieth century, Tangier's population had risen to 1,064, making it one of the largest communities on the Eastern Shore. As oyster populations began to decline, the Tangierians replaced oystering with crabbing as their primary seafood industry. Islanders built their own crabbing buildings (though not in the same configuration as the current shanties). Tangierians turned more and more from agricultural pursuits as crabbing became the economic livelihood of the Island. Crabs were captured and processed/packed for shipping all over the United States via railroad from the depot at Crisfield. In 1930, with the invention of the crab pot, the industry grew until it was one of the most impressive in the country.

In April 1916, President Woodrow Wilson visited Tangier Island out of "curiosity." This unscheduled visit, and the subsequent article in the Washington Post, turned the eyes of the world on Tangier Island and started, though slowly at first, the trend toward Tangier as a place of interest to tourists and sparked what would later become an economically important tourist industry.

In 1917, the Federal government used a dredge to deepen the waters off of the northern end of Main Ridge, creating a boat basin. The spoil, which was deposited next to Main Ridge, created new land adjacent to deep water. Then in 1921, the government paid to have a channel of deep water dredged from the Tangier Sound northeast of East Point to the newly dredged basin, thus providing Tangierians with their first real harbor. This only helped to further deepen the Islanders' commitment to crabbing as an industry and also hastened the Main Ridge's role as the center of economic and social life on the Island.

World War I had little physical impact on Tangier and industry continued to evolve throughout the War. In 1918, a shirt factory was opened on the Main Ridge, providing jobs for the women of the Island. At the same time, the tourism industry had begun to flourish, largely due to the presidential visit and the New York City businessmen who traveled to Tangier to sell wares to the Islanders.

By the time the U.S. became engaged in World War II, the Uppards settlements, Canaan, Persimmon Ridge, Reuben Town and Oyster Creek, had been abandoned and the population had become even more concentrated on the Main Ridge. Ross Landon, who lived on Canaan, recalls that his house, along with several others, was moved by barge from Uppards to the West Ridge of the Island. While Oyster Creek would eventually be lost to erosion, it was not impending water that drove the residents of these Uppards settlements to move. Oyster Creek had no school and no store. The school on Canaan was closed in 1921 and the residents, along with many of their houses, moved onto the main island.

The socially and culturally distinct way of life on Tangier Island continued through the midtwentieth century. In 1943, most homes on Tangier still had no wells, but barrels or cisterns for the collection of rainwater. West Ridge Road was still unpaved. The portion of Main Ridge that lay between the Methodist Church and the harbor had still not been developed. The town council met in the electric plant in a small tin building that also served as a jail.

By the mid-forties Tangier had four telephones on the island that were linked to Crisfield by radio. There was also electricity on the Island, though it was only available between 5:00 in the afternoon and 10:30 at night. In 1946, the "Electric Fund" was created and by 1947, Tangier had modern electric service under the auspices of the Chesapeake Islands Electric Cooperative .

In 1946, Reverend James Richardson withdrew from the Tangier Methodist Church and started the New Testament Congregation, an event that caused major turmoil on the Island. Religion had always been a central part of Tangier life, with one congregation representing the entire Island. The fact that there was no longer one central church to unite the Islanders caused divisions amongst the inhabitants. Both Swain Methodist and New Testament remain active congregations.

The decades after World War II were "still shaped by age old rhythms of drawing a livelihood from the water." Tangierians continued to rely on crabbing to earn their living, a fact that caused problems during the "crab wars" which started in 1949 as the Virginia Fisheries tried to enforce restrictions on crabbing to preserve marine populations. This struggle would continue throughout the second half of the twentieth century, and still causes divisions today, as some Islanders speak out today against the Chesapeake Bay Foundation and the Virginia Marine Resources Commission.

The 1970s and 1980s marked the beginning of the real tourism boom on Tangier. In 1974, as many as 15,000 people a year were visiting the Island during the summer tour boat season. In 1986, Thomas J. Eulice founded Tangier Lines, Inc., to ferry passengers to and from the Island. Although tourism provides an important boost to the local economy, the Island has resisted becoming an overdeveloped tourist destination. Such resistance has helped preserve the character-defining aspects of Tangier's cultural landscape.

Several modern innovations came to the Island in the second half of the twentieth century. In 1975, the old radio telephone system was replaced with a highly visible microwave tower. In 1983, water and sewage treatment facilities were installed. In 1983, a firehouse was erected and several bridges were rebuilt in the 1990s to enable fire engines to cross from ridge to ridge.

As the twentieth century drew to a close "it was the pursuit of the blue crab that shaped much of Tangier life." Watermen rose as early as 3:30 a.m. and spent the day on the water. Crab houses were used for the molting of crabs, which were then packed on ice and shipped, bound for Crisfield and ports far away. Religion remained a central part of life on the Island, with the Islanders representing the only town on the Eastern Shore to vote against the Virginia Lottery in 1987. Most Islanders still attend church (66%), though in speaking with the people of the Island it is clear that there are many different opinions regarding the Island's religious make-up and that the Islanders in no way present a united moral front against modern, "immoral" practices.

On the Bay, the only other comparable watermen's community exists just to the north on Smith Island, Maryland. Due to proximity and early settlement patterns, some families of Smith and Tangier Islands are related.

According to Kirk Mariner, author and Chesapeake Bay historian, "As a new century loomed, the Island was shrinking, its population [650 persons] was declining, the opportunities for living off the water constricted, and the modern world encroaching. Yet Tangier's distinctive way of life, deeply grounded in religious faith, was very much intact, and its residents hopeful that their island still faced a long future."

As of 2013, there are about 400 residents, including about 60 active watermen. The watermen and their families maintain their traditions, and Mayor James "Ooker" Eskridge, a waterman, acts as an ambassador, encouraging appreciation of this unique Virginia place. The Island attracts tourists (some who arrive on cruise ships) and visitors who appreciate the flavors and beauty of Chesapeake Bay and the proud, hard working, people of Tangier.

Criterion A Justification

The Tangier Island Historic District is significant under Criterion A at the state level in the areas of Commerce, Ethnic Heritage: Native American, Ethnic Heritage: African American, Industry, Maritime, Military, and Religion. Referred to as the "soft-shell crab capital of the world", Tangier Island is proud of its watermen heritage which stretches from the nineteenth century up to the present day. Seafood commerce and industry is still the Island's primary economic base. The watermen and their family activities in the seafood industry, coupled with the strong maritime heritage, are significant in the context of Chesapeake Bay history. Themes of commerce are closely related to the blue crab industry, but Tangier also features several historic store buildings (and store sites), a shirt factory site, and several sites related to canning and processing of seafood.

The significant ethnic heritage is related to the early Native American marine harvesting activity and the abandonment of Indian prisoners on the Island in July 1645. While traditionally, the African American population of the Island has remained low, the enlistment of self-emancipated slaves by the British in 1814 and their training at Fort Albion on Tangier is significant. These enlisted black soldiers later settled as freedmen in the Caribbean. During the War of 1812, the Island played a primary role as the site of Fort Albion during British occupation in 1814 and is therefore significant for military history (the fort site is not in the district and indeed its location has not been fully determined, but there is potential for related sites of the military occupation within the boundaries). Tangier Island was also impacted by the American Revolution and Civil War.

Tangier Island Historic District is significant for religious history as the home to Methodist Reverend Joshua Thomas, known as "Parson of the Islands." Thomas firmly established Methodism in Maryland and Virginia areas of the Chesapeake Bay. He became the leader of Tangier's Camp Meetings, which attracted many worshipers from outside the Tangier community for nearly fifty years.

Criterion C Justification

The Tangier Island Historic District is significant under Criterion C for Architecture at the local level. The present built environment includes houses, stores, churches, a power plant, a post office, and a health clinic dating to the period c. 1890 to 1964; this same period saw the most significant growth of Tangier's oyster and blue crab industry. As a result of the Island's latenineteenth-century prosperity, the population increased to over 1000 residents in 1900 and much of the surviving Victorian-period buildings were constructed at this time. The architecture of the Uppards settlements was preserved when buildings were moved to the southern area of the Island, the Meat Soup area, in the 1920s and 1930s. The range of historic architecture includes later twentieth-century styles reflecting national trends of design as well as several historic-age mobile homes. This ensemble of historic architecture is set on a unique island landscape where historic roads, canal networks, and harbors serve as setting. While docks, piers, and crab shanties are more recently constructed in newer materials, they serve in place of earlier functional buildings that were on the same sites lining the harbor. The current shanties, while non-historic, reflect the more recent approach to harvesting soft shell crabs and continue to provide an appropriate setting.

Criterion D Justification

Tangier Island is significant under Criterion D at the local level in the areas of Archaeology-Prehistoric and Archaeology-Historic. To date, survey and testing have focused on the recovery of eroding human burials at Uppards Cemetery (44AC0571), and pedestrian survey of the beaches and exposed banks along the northwestern and northern shore of the island. Excavation and recovery of the human burials yielded hardware and artifacts consistent with interment between the last quarter of the 19th century and the first quarter of the 20th century. This exercise provided insight into the burial practices of a small, geographically isolated population, and additional physical analysis of the remains is expected to provide significant information about local health and subsistence.

Brief pedestrian survey of the beaches immediately adjacent to the cemetery identified a well lined with handmade brick, and produced a quantity of artifacts diagnostic of use and settlement from the Late Woodland period through the early 20th century. Dark green and patent medicine bottle glass, 19th century ceramic sherds, pressed glass, hand- and machine-made brick, and ceramic doorknobs were noted on the beach and emerging from cutbanks. The artifact assemblage is consistent with the occupation of the village of Canaan, which was abandoned in the early 20th century. Given the presence of the well and the remaining interments in the Uppards Cemetery, as well as the quantity of materials eroding from the shoreline, it is likely that additional features and deposits associated with Canaan are present in this location. Targeted investigation within the locations of the settlements of Reubentown and Persimmon Ridge would likely result in similar discoveries. The presence of diked enclosures, visible in aerial photographs of Uppards, is further indication that physical evidence of the early settlements of Reubentown and Persimmon Ridge remains intact on the high ridges of the northern part of the island. Although the original purpose of these features cannot be ascertained, it is clear that the structures were built in order to keep the interior areas drier. As such it is probable that additional features associated with the domestic, agricultural, or industrial use of the enclosures remain intact in these locations. Similar diked enclosures may be seen on aerial photographs of the occupied southern half of the island as well, some of which are still associated with domestic and commercial buildings. It is likely that additional features of historic occupation (cemeteries, foundations, refuse deposits, etc.) also remain intact in these areas. Given that our current knowledge of the historic settlement of the Uppards is based largely on oral history, archaeological investigation is likely to provide new and essential information not otherwise available.

Pedestrian survey of the northwestern and northern shore of Uppards resulted in the identification of lithic and ceramic artifacts diagnostic of the Paleoindian, Archaic, and Woodland cultural periods. This is echoed by the personal collections of island residents, who have confirmed finding these materials on the beaches and eroding from cutbanks. This lengthy scatter of artifacts was recorded as archaeological site 44AC0524, and represents native use of the island and exploitation of its resources. In 2001, Darrin Lowery included Tangier Island in his overview of Chesapeake Bay coastal sites in Virginia and Maryland, during which he interviewed local residents and inspected their artifact collections. These collections included lithic tools diagnostic of every period of human occupation between the Paleoindian and the Late Woodland, and were collected largely from the unoccupied northern (or "Uppards") side of the island. Lowery's pedestrian walkover of shorelines on the northern island resulted in the determination that cultural horizons likely survived beneath layers of flood marsh soils, and that the potential for submerged sites at the margins of the island was considerable (Lowery, 2001). A 2003 assessment performed by Cultural Resources, Inc., also involving informant interviews, viewing of collections, and limited pedestrian survey, reached a similar conclusion with regard to the northern portion of the island (Richards and Cooke, 2003).

Although the island's shoreline has been repeatedly altered by erosion and sea level rise, the quantity of material present on the beaches indicates that potential for surviving deposits (both submerged and otherwise) is high. No comprehensive investigation of shoreline sites in the southern Chesapeake Bay has been undertaken, but even within this region the environment presented by Tangier Island is unique. As such, site 44AC0524 holds the potential to provide information significant to a holistic understanding of the prehistory of the Bay, including changes in subsistence and short-term occupation patterns, and material technologies, as well as an understanding of the role played by Tangier Island.

The southern portion of Tangier Island has not been subjected to professional archaeological survey or assessment. The presence of prehistoric and early historic archaeological materials and sites on Uppards, however, indicates that potential for similar evidence on the southern portion of the island is considerable. As mentioned in the historic narrative, during the War of 1812 the British Army constructed and garrisoned Fort Albion on what was then the southern end of Tangier Island. The fort included earthen breastworks, cannon, and several water wells, along with houses, a church, and a hospital. Although the location of Fort Albion is now submerged, archaeologists believe that evidence for the fortification and associated structures remains intact. Marine archaeologists plan to survey the Bay floor in 2014 to determine the extent of this evidence. On the terrestrial portions of Tangier Island, targeted investigation of the diked areas identified in aerial photographs has the potential to provide additional information regarding early historic use and occupation of the southern portion of the island, as does investigation of the yards and open areas along the currently occupied ridgelines. Finally, the identified historic cemeteries should be considered archaeological resources as well as architectural. The oldest interments contain the potential to provide information important to our understanding of population health and mortality, growth patterns, and funerary traditions in this unique community.

Although investigations to date have yielded information demonstrating that Tangier Island Historic District is significant at the local level under Criterion D, future professional investigations may provide evidence of significance at the statewide level. Much of the district's archaeological potential remains to be explored.

Verbal Boundary Description (Describe the boundaries of the property.)

The boundaries include the northern and southern areas of Tangier Island and the channel and harbor area in between the two sections, as shown on the attached maps entitled "Tangier Island Historic District, Accomack County, Virginia, DHR No. 309-0001, Aerial View," and "Map with Street Names, Tangier Island Historic District, 309-0001, Accomack County, Tangier Island Quad." The eastern edge of the boundary follows the eastern edge of the Island at high tide level. The boundary includes the sand spit, land extending into Cod Harbor, on the southern end of the island. The western boundary excludes the airport, incinerator plant, and boat yard parcels.

Boundary Justification (Explain why the boundaries were selected.)

The boundaries encompass the complete land area of Tangier Island, the northern formerly inhabited section, Uppards, and the southern currently inhabited area. The encompassed area contains the most significant archaeology and architecture. The boundaries exclude the western edge of the southern section of the Island where the airport, incinerator plant, and boat yard were built partly on landfill taken from the West Channel dredging in 1967. All of the buildings and structures on the western landfill edge date to 1968 and later. The boundaries also exclude the small island called Port Isabel, on the east side of the Mailboat Harbor. Port Isabel, historically known as East Point, was an inhabited island in the 1800s, but is now the site of contemporary buildings used by the Chesapeake Bay Foundation.
